Teaching a course allows you to put knowledge into practice, share first-hand insights into your research topic and develop your academic portfolio. However, having to teach yet another course can be experienced as an additional burden. How do you make the most of teaching without spending weekends reading seminar papers or answering emails from students? How do you include your own research in your courses? And, how do you get the “interesting” courses in the first place?

With doctoral candidates and alumni who will provide insights into their teaching experiences:

Sandra Banjac

Assistant Professor at the University of Groningen

Michael Anranter

ViDSS Student in social and cultural anthropology

Vera Dafert

ViDSS Student in sociology
